

In the Wind

Hook: A song to throw on the fire when it's burning low.

Short Bio: 'In the Wind' carries a weightless melancholy, drifting through reminiscence and longing with open arms.

Medium Bio: There's a certain peace in knowing that nothing stays the same; 'In the Wind' leans into the inevitability of change — quietly accepting the things we cannot keep. It's a song for when the fire's already out, but you're still sitting by the warmth of the glowing coals — longing for what was and what might have been, while pondering what may be next.

Long Bio: 'In the Wind' is a musing on impermanence, meandering through memories and anticipating recurring patterns. It leans into the cyclical nature of change — how love fades, but the knowledge that it will return always softens the grief. Sometimes, losing the person you were giving all your love to can make space for self-love. The song doesn't search for closure; it flows within the turbulence of feelings that never quite settle.

The sound is sparse and intentional, with acoustic textures and space to breathe — a tangible breath in the cold winter air. This song sits with the ache of nostalgia, not to cure it, just to gently treat the symptoms — like gathering kindling, not to rebuild something lost, but to warm what remains.
